

Q. A lunchroom gossip circle sometimes includes discussions on others' private business, rumors, and personal matters behind co-workers' backs. Most of the chatter is harmless, but negativity and mocking periodically pop up. How should I intervene?

A. Informal gatherings play a key role in relieving workplace stress, but it's important they do not cause a decline in morale. Be up front about the concept of psychological safety in the workplace and consider holding a workshop or seminar on the topic. In this context, psychological safety means feeling confident that one will not be a victim of gossip, be mocked, or have their sense of belonging diminished. Get buy-in from employees on their shared responsibility by emphasizing that all employees have a role in maintaining psychological safety. Ask employees to monitor each other. As a supervisor, model respectful language, redirect conversations, and show employees how to keep discussions non-gossipy and constructive. You can change this group's dynamic through repeated modeling—consistently demonstrating, through your own words and behavior, how to have respectful, non-gossipy conversations. Ask the EAP about training and education on respect in the workplace.

Q. My truck driver has asked me to allow him take a nap every day at 1:00 p.m. after lunch. He says it's a safety issue, so he doesn't fall asleep on the highway because he had a close call recently. Am I being snowed, or is it something I should consider?

A. Based on the behavioral concerns and a close call, refer your driver to the EAP for a confidential assessment. The EAP will decide next steps like a sleep evaluation and screening for apnea or other disorders. These may entail referral to other specialists. The mention of a safety issue and the possibility of a truck accident raise important issues; he does not feel safe driving after lunch during his regular business hours without a nap. Is this related to a high-carb, high-fat lunch? Could it be a medical problem, like a sleep disorder? Does this situation require a fitness-for-duty examination? These questions mean that you should collaborate with your human resources advisor and next-level management. As a matter of course, you should not outright allow an employee to nap daily for an hour on the clock without a well-crafted and justified accommodation supported by a medical doctor. Granting such a request outright would create issues related to team equity and morale.

Q. I had a casual conversation with my employee recently. He mentioned in passing that he thought seriously about ending his life several weeks ago over his spouse leaving. He denies any feelings like that now. I suggested the EAP, but he says he is past the crisis. Should I consult with the EAP?

A. Yes. Your phone call to the EAP is confidential, and its consultative role is essential here. You cannot diagnose an employee's mental health state, and what you heard—recent suicidal thinking—warrants professional guidance. Employees may minimize or deny ongoing risk, so a consultation helps determine actual risk and next steps the EAP might recommend. For many, suicidal ideation can be revisited as a means of dealing with a crisis. The EAP can coach you on how to encourage him to phone the program or at least make doing so more likely. Consulting with the EAP also demonstrates your understanding of duty-of-care obligations and how to respond if risk escalates. In addition, consulting protects the organization, reduces liability, and ensures a consistent, policy-aligned response. Finally, calling the EAP supports you as a supervisor, helps you worry less, and gives you a clear action plan instead of leaving you ruminating over what, if anything, you should do next.

Q ■ What is the difference between “micro-coaching” and micromanaging?

A ■ Micro-coaching is a useful leadership construct that helps clarify the distinction between effective supervision and micromanagement. Most supervisors know employees detest micromanagement, but some still struggle to avoid it. Micro-coaching makes this easier to recognize. For example, if you micromanage, you delegate a task and then ask, “Did you do it the way I told you?” You might make repeated corrections, hover, or even redo the work yourself. As expected, micromanagement encourages dependency. Mistakes are not seen as learning opportunities, but as reasons to increase control and scrutiny. This creates anxious employees who hesitate to take initiative. If an employee is more focused on avoiding mistakes and pleasing you rather than on doing what’s best, you are micromanaging. When you micro-coach, you ask questions like “What’s your plan?” or “What did you learn?” or “What would make this more complete?” Your goal is to help employees think, decide, improve, and grow. If you value employees who think, adapt, and innovate, use micro-coaching techniques. Contact the Employee Assistance Program (EAP) for more tips on supervising employees.

Q ■ I’ve been a supervisor for 17 years. I think I am very attuned to recognizing the needs of my employees. Still, I hear emotional intelligence is the biggest struggle for supervisors, even for experienced managers like me. How so?

A ■ Much attention has been given to the value of emotional intelligence for employees and supervisors alike. This skill comes more naturally for some but can be learned and practiced consciously. Not appreciating its value and impact can hold some managers back from examining and employing emotional intelligence. One mistake is thinking emotional intelligence is an accommodation—a “touchy-feely” concept that primarily focuses on how it benefits others. This is a serious misconception. For example, it can be a great benefit to an organization when a senior manager pays attention to the emotional feel or atmosphere of a conference room when walking into it. Instead of quickly launching into operational issues, those who spend a few seconds to consider the atmosphere and tenor of the group can create significant returns when they read the room, adjust their communication, and consider decisions in real time. This ultimately leads to more effective and productive discussions, along with improved engagement and reduced tension for those present. Everyone wins with emotional intelligence.
